BeetleCam

In their quest for a fresh approach to photographing wildlife, English brothers Will and Matt Burrard-Lucas had a wild idea: a remote-controlled, camera-equipped buggy.

The photographers traveled to animal-rich southwestern Tanzania, where they tested their invention, called BeetleCam.

Having successfully field-tested BeetleCam on elephants, the Burrard-Lucas brothers, "buoyed with optimism," moved on to the king of the African savanna: the lion.

But "in hindsight, this was a foolish idea," they blogged on April 19 – the camera was promptly mauled by a female lion, which carried the gear far into the bush.

But the Burrard-Lucas brothers considered themselves "extremely lucky" to retrieve an intact memory card from the mangled camera – found damaged but still attached to BeetleCam after a long search.

"On downloading the images, we were delighted to find that BeetleCam had performed its duty admirably, and we got a great series of images from the encounter," they wrote on their blog on April 19.

After their big-cat encounter, the Burrard-Lucas brothers decided to leave lions off the menu, moving on to other "various unpredictable beasts," such as water buffalo, the duo noted on their blog.

Elderly bachelor buffalo proved to be the most cooperative subjects, ambling up to investigate – but not bite – the device.
